

Morse Code has become obsolete since the use of satellites. Even the Coast Guard is no longer monitoring for Morse Code. Since Code is no longer a necessary means of communication it should be removed from licensing requirements to bring Amateur Radio into the 21st century. Those who want to learn code may do so, and use the bands set aside for it, but more emphasis should be placed on knowledge required to use the other modes of communication, and these should be reflected in the testing for licensing for General and Extra licenses.
